Reading this made me realize a website doesn't have to be some perfect portfolio that explains me like a resume. It can be more like a place that changes with me, like a room or a garden where I can move things around and add stuff over time. I like the idea that the internet isn't just one big cloud, it's made of tons of small "nodes" made by real people, and having your own site is a way to be one of those nodes instead of depending on Instagram or whatever. The metaphors help because they make it feel less intimidating, like I can start small, even with something messy or unfinished, and it's still valid. I think my website could be a little workshop by the river where I have experiments, links, sketches, and random thoughts, and it slowly grows as I learn more. I think by the end of this class I would like to have a website I can call my own
